

Amanda C. Downey

Amanda is Senior Counsel at National Grid US, an electricity and gas company serving New York, Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Amanda supports the Company's Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) regulated businesses and serves as lead in-house counsel for the Company's FERC audits and investigations. Prior to serving as Company counsel, Amanda served as Executive Advisor to the Executive Vice President of Regulation and Pricing.

Before joining National Grid, Amanda served as in-house counsel for an investment banking, securities and wealth management firm in New York City. Prior to that, she was Assistant Director for a college preparatory program at Ohio Wesleyan University.

Amanda is a member of the American Association of Blacks in Energy (AABE®), a national, non-profit association of energy professionals dedicated to ensuring the input of Blacks and other minorities into the discussions and development of energy policy, regulations, R&D technology, and environmental issues. Amanda is the founding president of the Greater Boston Chapter of AABE, a local non-profit organization established to further AABE's mission in the Greater Boston area and to help build the pipeline of people of color to enter the energy industry.

Amanda serves on the AABE Regional Council as the Northeast Regional Director. She also serves on the Board of Trustees at the Boston Green Academy, a Horace Mann Charter School in Boston Public Schools.

Amanda holds a Master of Laws in Banking, Corporate and Finance Law from Fordham University School of Law, a Juris Doctor from Thurgood Marshall School of Law, a Master of Business Administration degree from Franklin University and a Bachelor of Science degree in English Education from Bowling Green State University.

Amanda is licensed to practice law in New York and Texas and is registered to practice in Massachusetts.
